

WRITING AS EXPLORATION (WREX-UF)

WREX-UF 101 Writing as Exploration (4 Credits)

Typically offered Fall

The first in a two-course series, Writing as Exploration expands and complicates students' understanding of the essay in its varied forms and functions. (For each section's specific theme, see your academic advisor or refer to the Writing as Exploration Course Descriptions on the LS Core Curriculum webpage.) The course offers occasions to practice essay writing in several modes, including personal, critical, academic, and journalistic. It also exposes students to writing, reading, and critical thinking skills necessary for interdisciplinary, undergraduate work as well as writing beyond academic contexts. While each course is themed around a particular subject that draws on the professor's area(s) of expertise, all courses emphasize the role writing plays in narrating and analyzing global issues and/or perspectives. In addition, the theme of each course considers global issues (in part or through the whole of the course) and perspectives through reading and writing assignments.

WREX-UF 9101 Writing as Exploration (4 Credits)

Writing I has two main objectives: first, to develop the students' self-confidence and fluency by engaging them in the use of writing to express, explore, and develop ideas through a variety of forms, including informal writing (free writing, journal writing, etc.); second, to engage them in practicing the same kinds of critical and analytical skills they will use throughout their two years in Liberal Studies's writing intensive program. The class is conducted as a workshop. Students produce a wide range of writing, both in and out of class, which forms the basis for classroom activities. All papers go through multiple drafts, often with input from peers as well as the instructor.
