Program Description

The doctoral program of Middle Eastern and Islamic Studies provides training in fields relating to the history, cultures, languages, literatures and religions of the Middle East, focusing on the period from the rise of Islam to the present. Members of the department are drawn from different disciplines and specializations (including history, anthropology, literature, Islamic studies, language instruction, sociology, and political science) and are committed to providing students with a solid disciplinary grounding; at the same time, the department fosters innovative interdisciplinary and comparative approaches to the study of the Middle East. Several of the department's faculty have joint appointments with other academic units at NYU.

MEIS offers a program of coursework and supervised research leading to the doctorate in Middle Eastern and Islamic Studies. Students in the MEIS doctoral program concentrate their studies in one of three tracks: Islamic Studies, Literature or Culture and Representation. In collaboration with the History Department, department also offers a Joint PhD Program in History and Middle Eastern and Islamic Studies. MEIS seeks prospective graduate students who are academically well-prepared and strongly committed to pursuing the PhD; as noted above, it has no MA program and does not offer that degree. Students who are interested in obtaining the MA, should apply to the Kevorkian Center's Program in Near Eastern Studies, which offers a terminal MA in Near Eastern Studies.

Additional Program Requirements

For PhD Students without an MA

Students who enter the department's PhD program without an MA must complete either a thesis or (with your advisor's approval) two seminar papers. This work is normally completed by the end of a student's second year of full-time study. Such students may register for a maximum of 4 credits of Thesis Research, to free them from regular coursework so that they can implement their research project or write their seminar papers.

Written Comprehensive Exams I and II

By the end of their third year of graduate study, students should have taken and passed a written comprehensive examination in each of their two major fields. Students prepare for these examinations through course work and by working through a reading list for each field under the supervision of the faculty member who will examine them. Specific tracks may require students to take a course to prepare for each examination; students should consult with their advisors for more information. Each examination will also be read by a second faculty member. Each written comprehensive examination will be followed by an oral examination, administered by the two readers. Students who do not pass a major field examination may petition the department for permission to take it one more time.

Language Requirements

Students must also demonstrate proficiency in one of Arabic, Persian, or Turkish as well as a reading knowledge sufficient for research purposes of at least one additional research language. A student may be required by his or her dissertation adviser to learn additional languages, in keeping with the student's specific research needs.

Dissertation Prospectus Defense

You may defend your dissertation proposal after you have completed all coursework (including all Incompletes), fulfilled your language requirements and passed your comprehensive exams. The student's advisor and two additional faculty members conducting the dissertation proposal defense may approve the proposal outright, require revisions or reject the proposal, as they see fit. Once you have successfully defended your proposal you will be considered to have attained ABD status and may be granted the MPhil degree.

Dissertation

On completion of all course work, the fulfillment of all language requirements, and the successful defense of the dissertation proposal, PhD candidates begin to write their dissertations. Each dissertation is read and approved by committee of at least three faculty members before moving to a final defense. The completed dissertation must conform to departmental and Graduate School of Arts and Science standards and be defended in a public oral defense in which those three readers and two additional examiners participate.
